Annotation: the concepts of spirituality and the spiritual world occupy a central place for many cultures and religions of the world. These concepts are often expressed through language, and the linguistic expression of these concepts can vary significantly from one language to another. This article explores spirituality and the linguistic expression of the spiritual world in English and Uzbek. This article is based on a combination of linguistic and cultural analysis to study the linguistic expression of spirituality and the spiritual world in English and Uzbek.

Keywords: Linguistics, spirituality, thinking, spiritual world.

Introduction

It has been shown that the concepts of spirituality and the spiritual world are expressed in different ways in English and Uzbek. In English, these concepts are often expressed using abstract nouns such as "spirit", "soul", and "God". In Uzbek, these concepts are often expressed using more specific nouns, such as "Spirit" ("Spirit") and "Paradise" ("Paradise"). It has also been found that the grammatical properties of these concepts differ from one language to another. In English, these concepts are often expressed using adjectives such as "spiritual" and "sacred". In Uzbek, these concepts are often expressed using verbs such as "praying".

In English, spirituality is expressed not only as a religious level, but also as a larger concept. R. Tanya interpreted the term as follows, and it should be noted that this definition is wider than others:

"Spirituality may or may not be associated with religion. It requires a connection with self-selected religious beliefs, values, and practices that give meaning to life, and thus inspires and encourages individuals to achieve their acceptable existence. This connection brings faith, hope, peace and strength. The result is joy, forgiveness of oneself and others, awareness and acceptance of hardship and death, a sense of physical and emotional well-being, and the ability to go beyond the vulnerabilities of being".

The above is one of the leading concepts in the series "spirituality" and is an explanation of the word justice, an extremely important element of the concept of universal spirituality. The review contains three types of definitions, and most of them interpret the term from a legal point of view. In the first three comments, the definition of fair agreement, the criterion of trust, equality and justice is the guarantee of what is owned. The essence of understanding in these comments is based on a relative context.

One of the most common concepts of this commentary is related to the expression of compassion in Uzbek. The etymology of this unit also goes back to Latin, and then to Old French. The expression is explained as follows: - more compassion than Justice and compassion; - more compassion than expected or possible; - pity, kind attitude. The appendix to the note also contains the meaning of the word. Units such as Pardon, kindness, gentleness are mentioned as the meaning of the word mercy, and compassion for the enemy is explained.

Many definitions of the concept of "spirituality" can be cited, which are used in scientific, philosophical, literary thinking or in the language of the common people. They differ from each other in content and essence. The moment reflects the specific developmental evolution of this concept and indicates that it has a broad meaning. At the same time, this concept, which embodies a very deep and comprehensive meaning in itself, can be described differently by any enlightened person, based on his life views, personal beliefs, mindfulness and worldview. That is why, in the scientific literature on this issue, when we meet different opinions in the Daily Press, it is appropriate to perceive them as an expression of the unique worldview of any author, his style in observation.

The content of the concept of spirituality is not limited today only within the framework of the words "mine", "meaning". Why, this concept, which makes a person a person, closely connected with his consciousness and psyche, acquires such special importance in the life of any person, society, nation and people that it cannot be measured by anything.

In English, spirituality comes from a religious worldview, and it is explained as follows: in general, the term denotes approaches to discovery, experiencing.

It can be seen that spirituality is not only a personal but also a social concept. National progress is limited by the progress of his thinking.

Conclusion

From the above points, the category of the concept of "spirituality" is divided into three large groups. These are units of feelings and morality that represent the phenomena of consciousness.
